Our work on the structure of the foot process in human mesangial cells has revealed that a significant amount of this membrane is made of phosphotyrosyl (P-Tyr) proteins as indicated by the identification of the P-Tyr proteins in aqueous extract. A number of these polypeptides appear to be tyrosylated and are closely associated with the actin cytoskeleton. We intend to investigate the association of these P-Tyr proteins with the cellular skeleton of the foot process in mesangial cells. In this proposal, we will determine if the P-Tyr proteins are associated with actin, actin-associated proteins, glycoconjugates or other foot process proteins. The association of P-Tyr proteins with the cytoskeleton may have an impact on the function of mesangial cells. Furthermore, P-Tyr proteins may be associated with other important cellular structures in other cell types. The aims are to (1) establish the distribution of P-Tyr proteins in glomeruli and in cultured cells, (2) investigate the effect of cytoskeletal proteins on the tyrosylation of the P-Tyr proteins in isolated cell fractions, and (3) determine which antibodies bind to these P-Tyr proteins and if any of these antibodies are able to inhibit the tyrosylation of these proteins. The specific aims will be accomplished using immunocytochemistry, immunoelectron microscopy and biochemical assays for the measurement of tyrosylation. The long term goal of this project is to increase our understanding of the interaction between the extracellular matrix and the cell which may improve our ability to inhibit the progression of renal disease and to improve the treatment of other extracellular matrix related diseases. One of the highlights of the first edition of the Downtown Film
